He started into her face

He stared into her face, her eyes were sleeping shut
He wanted her to awaken, to share with her his gut
The guilt that he was feeling, the shame of cheating lies
He stared into her face and he hoped that he might cry
But nothing came bubbling up, no emotion and no pain
He felt toward her ambivalence as if all were still the same
He stared into her face, then he went back to sleep
Cold and without feeling a secrets easy to keep

She stared into his eyes, lifeless like a doll
Looking at him was more akin to staring at a wall
She knew he didn't love her, she knew he wanted out
She'd known since their son was born, she knew it without doubt
But still she felt nothing, no emotion and no pain
All the work she had done now felt as if in vain
She stared into his eyes, but she couldn't see his soul
Funny how our half full cup is but an empty bowl

They stared at each other, and then they turned away
There was nothing more to do, nothing more to say
Both of them had once felt love, but that had gone away
Now both live to be alone, and that's how it is today
